4. Excerpts from a news analysis in a national daily (Unseen Passages):

Bad or worse: On the faultlines within the Israel's ruling coalition

The faultlines within the ruling coalition in Israel are becoming increasingly evident.

The resignation of lawmaker Idit Silman from Israel's diverse ruling coalition has taken the Jewish country's politics back to crisis and instability. With Ms. Silman defecting to the opposition Likud, Prime Minister Naftali Bennett's government, which had the razor-thin majority of 61 lawmakers in the 120-member Knesset, lacks the numbers. Elected to the Knesset from Mr. Bennett's right-religious Yamina party, Ms. Silman had earlier clashed with the Health Minister over allowing leavened grain products (hametz) in hospitals during the Passover holidays. In her resignation letter, she said she could not support "harming the Jewish identity of the state of Israel". But the real political crisis in Israel is deeper than the hametz controversy. Ever since the coalition government was formed in June last year, Likud has been in constant campaign mode, attacking Yamina for "stealing right-wing votes" and using them to form "a dangerous left-wing government". The Knesset is now in recess until mid-May. When it convenes, the Opposition will need one more lawmaker to defect if it wants to bring down the government through a no-trust motion. Former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is likely to do everything he can, as the leader of Likud, to get more right-wing MKs to break with the coalition. And the
