She'd look at this board every day and imagine her life in her perfect cottage. She knew these sort of houses were incredibly popular, but she was in the best possible position. She was a first time buyer and she had a decent deposit. The only thing she didn't have was a job, but hopefully that wouldn't be the case for too much longer.

She had planned to stay at her parents for a few months while she worked out her next steps. It was so good to see them, almost overwhelming. They didn't stop talking on the journey back to their house. On their return, Rita's parents told her some sad news. Her Aunty Julie had passed away. They wanted her to enjoy her last few days of travelling and so had decided to wait until she was back to tell her.

Rita made her way downstairs and devoured a full English breakfast with her parents. Afterwards, her mum presented her with a letter which her Aunty Julie had written for her. It detailed how she thought of Rita as her adoptive daughter and how she wanted her to one day inherit the cottage to which she had such a strong connection.

The charity was based only 20 miles away, meaning that if Rita got a car she would be within commutable distance. She decided to bypass the website and gave the charity a call. After a lengthy chat, she was invited in for an interview the following day.
